The oldest son Andrew wanted to be a joiner. Throughout the year, he had been learning how to make a wardrobe and a well-made bed in the workshop of a renowned craftsman. When it was time to leave, the master gave him a special table to remember him by. All you had to say was "let the table be set" and then it was spread and amply covered with the most exquisite dishes. But Andrew had to show off in the first inn in front of his friends. While the men feasted, the cunning innkeeper plotted how to take possession of the table. All he needed was the middle of the night, Andrew's deep sleep, a similar-looking table and that was it. He couldn't believe his eyes the next morning.

The youngest son George found himself in blacksmithing. By the end of the year, the teamsters did not ask for anyone else but George to horseshoe their horses. At the end of his apprenticeship, George received a huge club as a reward. "Go to the innkeeper and tell him to return the things he robbed your brothers of. If he refuses, just say 'club out of the sack' and watch what happens," said the smith, gave a conspiratorial wink and they parted ways. Of course, the innkeeper did not want to give up the donkey and the table, so George had to ask the club for help. As George commanded, the club flew out of the sack and started ruthlessly dancing on the thief's back.

Let the Table Be Set!

Do you know what happens if you boast to a horribly greedy person of magical objects you have earned by honest means? Well, read this story to find out how a thieving innkeeper takes a magic table from Andrew the cabinetmaker and a gold-bearing donkey from his brother Tony the miller. Luckily Georgie, the youngest brother, has been given a special cudgel, and all he has to do is call, "Cudgel, out of the sack!" for things to start happening. Would you like to know what kind of things? Then open this delightfully illustrated, interactive book by celebrated Czech artist Vojtěch Kubašta, and let the story tell itself!
