Francis, a dwarf just like from the stories, doesn't want to be small anymore. Giants can be as giant as a robust tree so why does Francis have to be teeny-tiny, miniature as an ant or a pinhead? If only I could be big, he wishes, and he wishes for it so fervently that he gets what he wanted in the end. But the whole business goes horribly awry—while the dwarf grows big, the giant becomes small.

Well, what's done is done. One big problem, though—Mrs. Giant is very very angry. How could a tiny giant raise their giant children? They would stomp him into the ground! Not to mention that Francis is too large for Fanny, his dwarfish girlfriend. She'll have to find a new groom to marry.

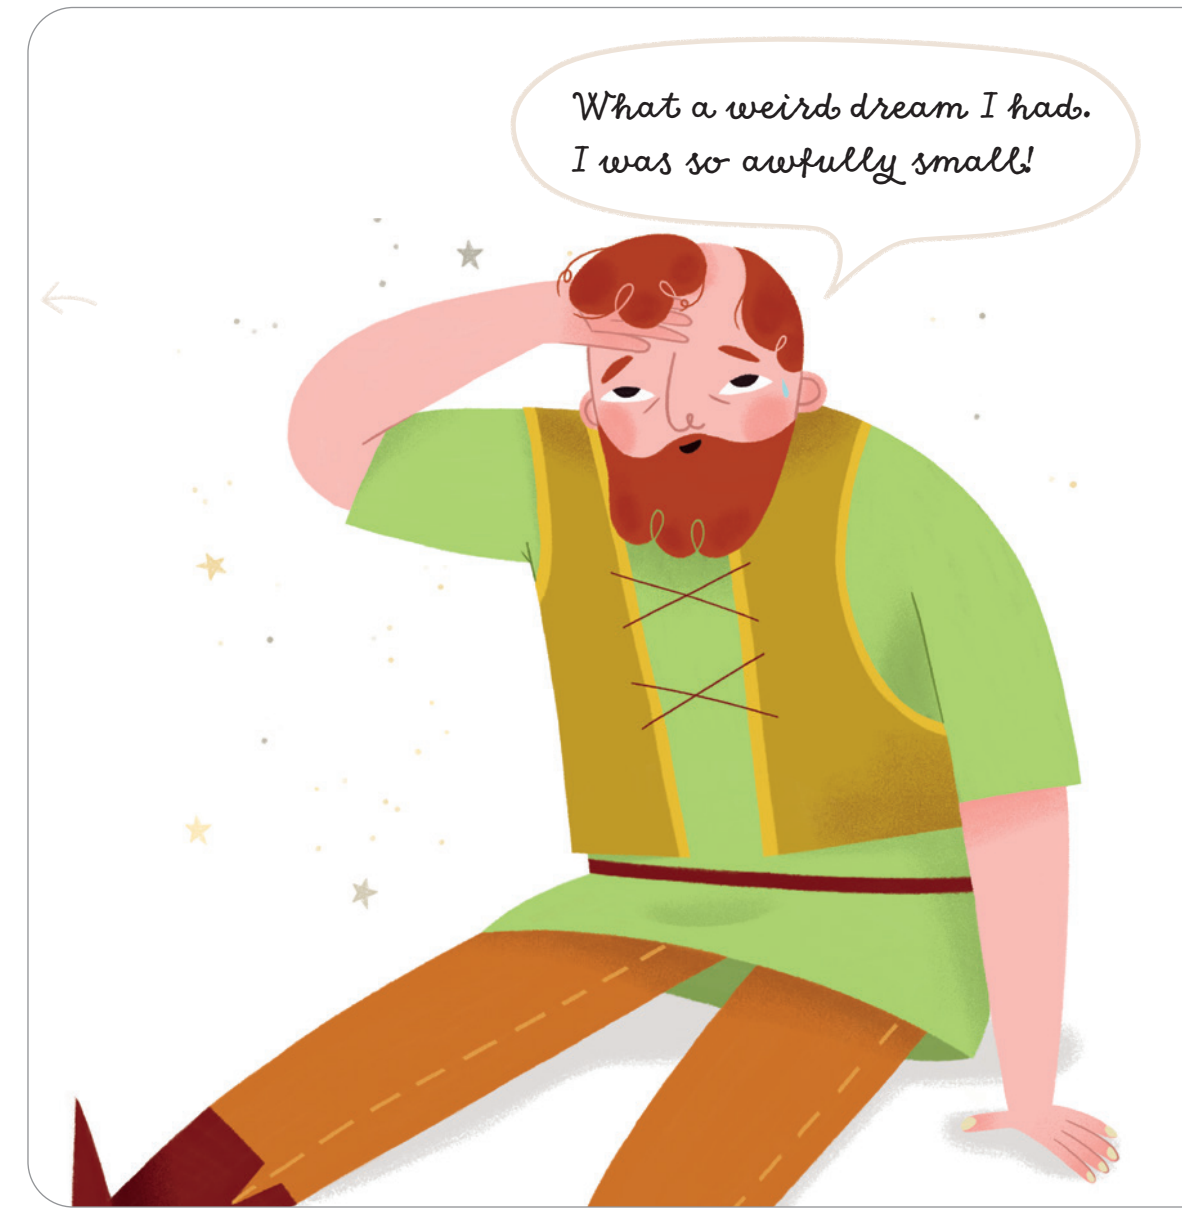

This should have never happened. Everyone should be happy with looking the way they do. Fortunately, this is a fictional story and we can set this mess to rights. How? It's very simple—name all the small and big things you know to make Francis smaller and turn the giant back into a big bloke.

SMALL or BIG?

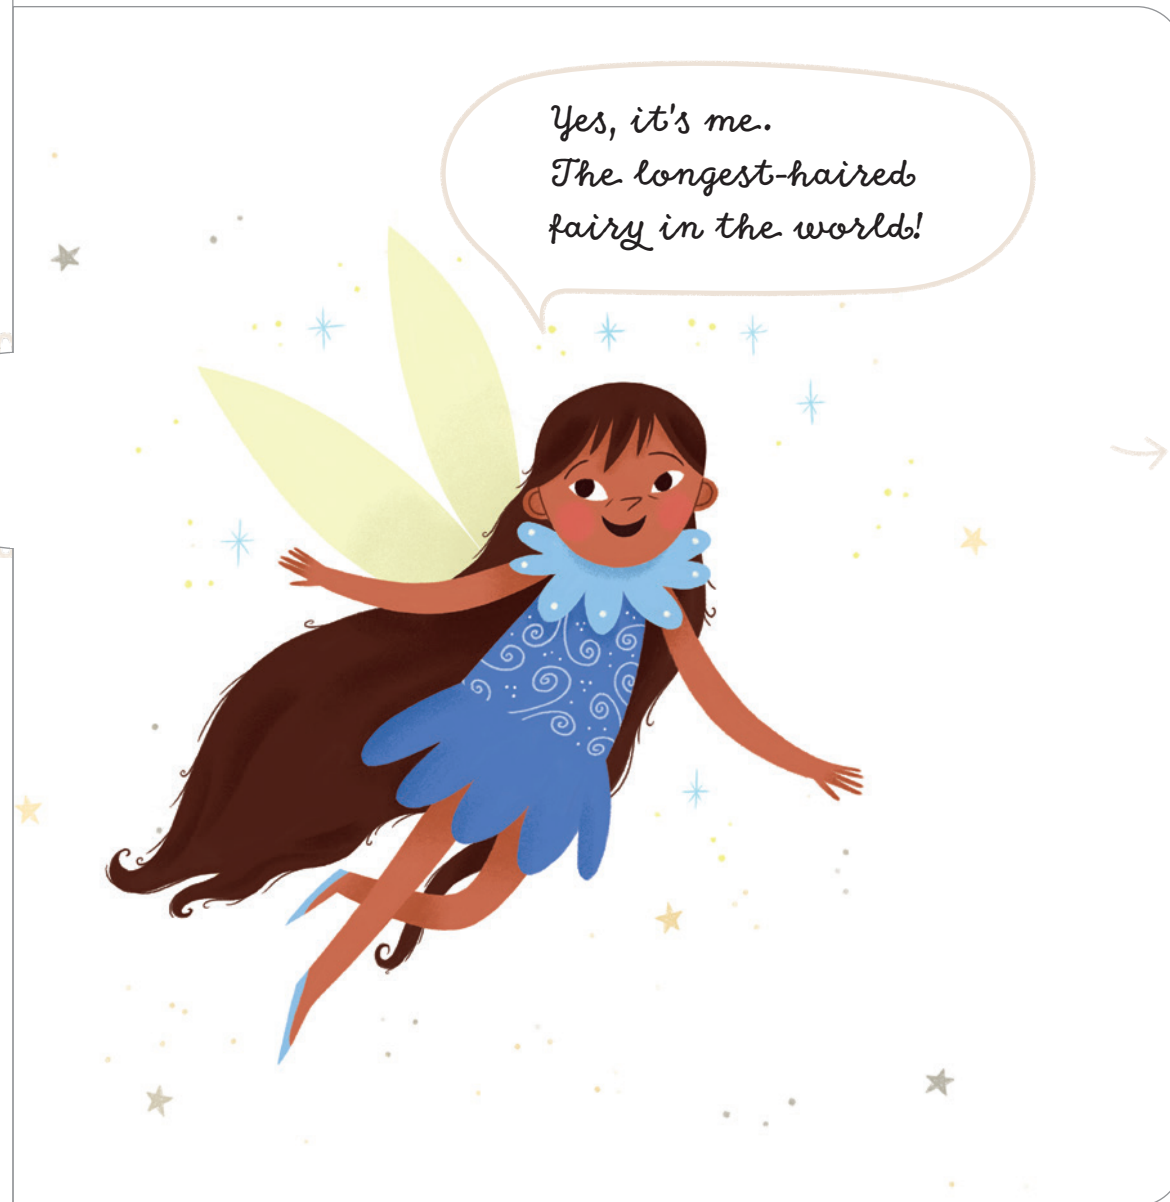

When you're in a fairy tale, making a single confusing wish can mess up the entire story. Francis may be a small dwarf again but Emily, a meadow fairy, is crying her eyes out. Where did her beautiful long hair go? And look at the farmer Johnny! He can't go work the field like this! Quick, kids; help them by remembering everything that's long or short.

SHORT or LONG?

Long hair's no good when you're working the field.

Sad princesses need to be sad before their princes set them free. But this one is grinning from ear to ear while her sadness found a new home in the face of Dorothy, the princess' once happy maid. Our story will never come to a happy end like this. Don't dawdle, kids, and name all the things which are sad and happy. Maybe you'll be able to help these fairy-tale ladies.

Tee-hee... I used to be sad once, you say? Why?

SAD or HAPPY?

Ooohhh, the world's so sad without my Wilhelm...

Anything can get confused in the world of confused stories. A singly careless wish is enough to turn Francis the dwarf into a giant, and his giant friend into a dwarf. And what about Karl, the fire-breathing dragon? He'd love to spit fire but the only thing he can spit is cold mist! Will you help the confused Francis undo his mistakes?
